
Consuming Identity: Cuisine, Adoption, and Identity in The Kimchi Chronicles

Piper Spooner

Emory University

Consuming food in a certain dining context creates a feeling or illusion of traveling, both geographically and temporally, to another, foreign place. The increasing availability of restaurants with different cuisines and the increasing ability of a greater number of people to partake of these foods allows for the vicarious consumption and experience of other countries and cultures, which now extends beyond mere restaurant dining to food travel shows and the advent of culinary tourism. Culinary tourism goes to other parts of the world with the purpose of eating other cuisines in contrast to more traditional tourism that consists of sight-seeing. Though this manifests in physical travel, culinary tourism much more often involves the production of media such as Food Network's many travel shows. However, these food shows do much more than advertise travel destinations. Through the camera's gaze and the narrative structure, these shows raise questions of the tourist-gaze, perception and conception of the Other, cultural capital and authority in both the purveyance and consumption of food, and the implications and effects of globalization and cosmopolitanism. The Kimchi Chronicles is one such series that addresses these issues as well as notions of national identity, historical and colonial narratives, hybridity, and liminality within an Asian and Asian American context.

The Kimchi Chronicles centers on Marja Vongerichten, a half Korean, half African American Korean adoptee who grew up in the United States, and who is now the wife of world-renowned French chef Jean-Georges Vongerichten. In the 13-episode series, Marja travels to South Korea with the purpose of discovering and exploring her Korean identity through the lens of eating and learning about Korean cuisine, which she then returns home to prepare for her family in her own kitchen in an ostensibly more authentic way than before. Each episode is located in a different part of Korea and focuses on a specific element of Korean cuisine, such as kimchi, which is ubiquitous, or shellfish sourced from the coastal city of Jeju. Though the show's introduction touches on Marja's biography, it only does so at a surface level, as does the show itself. Yet, it situates her in a curious position of simultaneously having and lacking Korean cultural authority and capital. Though she was born in Korea, she was raised in the United States by African American parents and has no memory of her years in Korea. Thus, in the States, she has the ability to speak authoritatively about Korean cuisine, dining, cultural practices, and traditions by virtue of her biographic origins, yet, once in Korea, she must defer to her travel guide and the native purveyors of the various foods she eats. Her own story and existence as a mixed-raced Korean adoptee also offers an interesting perspective of identity and belonging in an adoptee context in lieu of the historical and political legacy of the Korean War, American neocolonialism in Korea, and later South Korean constructions of national identity. Thus, The Kimchi Chronicles does much more than educate its audience about Korean cuisine and the diversity within it; it is an example of the ways in which other cultures and practices are presented to new audiences, and how the racial, ethnic, national, and cultural identity of the host presents the complexities of post-war Korea, liminal and hybrid identity, adoption and adoptee identity, cultural agency, and authenticity that all influence identity formation.

The Kimchi Chronicles aired in 2011 on the Public Broadcasting Service or PBS as a production sponsored by the Korean Ministry of Culture, Sports & Tourism and the Korean Ministry for Food, Agriculture, Forestry & Fisheries,¹ all of which illustrates both the show's pedagogical intent and its position in a broader context of the construction of a Korean national cuisine. The first episode quickly introduces the audience to Marja Vongerichten and her husband Jean-Georges before spending the rest of its runtime explaining the show's purpose and Marja's discussion of the distinctive characteristics of Korea, which includes the assertions that "Korean food isn't shy, it's all about loud, punchy flavors [and] communal eating [in a] culture that is rooted in tradition and committed to innovation," and that Koreans "need and enjoy hot and spicy food,"² as demonstrated in the near-ubiquitous use of gochujang in most Korean dishes, despite the fact that its red pepper base originates from Spain. These descriptors at best attempt to portray Korean food as uniquely bold and distinctive from other Asian cuisines, such as Japanese and Chinese, and from the monolith of "Asian food" itself, and at worst conforms to archetypes of Korean food as a foreign, unrefined, singular cuisine. However, it is precisely this conception of Korean food as consisting only of kimchi and bibimbap that The Kimchi Chronicles seeks to dismantle. In subsequent episodes, Marja, accompanied by a Korean translator, local food vendors, restaurant-owners, and home cooks, travels to different parts of Korea to taste and learn about the various regional cuisines, some of which include the abalone and shellfish delicacies of Jeju and Songgae, the bean varieties of Chodang, the fish of Sokcho, and the beef of Andong, among others. In each place, she learns about the local sourcing of each ingredient of interest before watching the preparation of special local dishes, usually by elderly women, and then eating them. This regional focus encompasses the ways in which "the local food movement and local media rely on the romanticization of the local, with the very word—'local'—conveying notions of morality, values, trust, and quality [where] both...are characterized by tension between local content and national policy.”³ Though the show seeks to educate the ignorant about the diversity of Korean cuisine, in doing so, it effectually plays on tropes about and romanticizes local food production as seen when Marja so often visits generations-old family-run restaurants and turns to elderly women as voices of culinary authority and authenticity, who also serve as quasi-maternal figures that guide her through Korea in ways her birth mother and American mother never could.

¹ "Credits." Kimchi Chronicles, PBS, accessed April 8, 2019, <http://www.kimchichronicles.tv/credits/>.

² The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 1, "The Kimchi Chronicles Begin," directed by Charles Pinsky, aired July 2, 2011, on PBS, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sdIInfQpOps&t=49s>.

While traveling outside of the larger cities of Seoul and Busan, Marja states that “peasant food is the absolute best food in any country because it’s simple [and] that’s what you want to eat”⁴ in an explicit glamorization of a sentimental and developmental past. Later, while in Jeju, she visits a local fish market with an older woman who seems to dress only in hanbok, speaks little English and lives in a so-called “Jeju Folk Village,” where she prepares a traditional stew over an open fire in a hut against rural scenery.⁵ Such a tableau acts not only to situate the woman in the past, but also the entire region of Korea in its fetishization of the preparation of this stew, which is particularly prominent in the woman’s traditional hanbok and the explicitly rural backdrop against which she cooks. Such scenery situates and idealizes both her and the region as a whole in the past of civilizational and technological underdevelopment in implicit contrast to mechanized food production of developed, modern, Western nations: “the local as fetish sees the local through the rose-tinted glasses of nostalgia and sentimentality...the demise of community solidarity immediately springs to mind....[accompanied by] the moral panic over the decline of ³ Christopher Ali, Media Localism: the Policies of Place (Urbana-Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2017) 31.

⁴ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 2, “The Rice Chronicles,” directed by Charles Pinsky, aired July 9, 2011, on PBS, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4SCLvutyVIA>.

⁵ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 3, “The Jeju Chronicles,” directed by Charles Pinsky, aired July 16, 2011, on PBS, <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=loFn13cE9JA>.

‘authentic’ communities.”⁶ In turning to an older Korean woman, Marja defers to a maternal elder who possesses greater life and culinary experience in a way that vaguely mirrors traditional Confucian and Asian cultural reverence of elders that is evocative of a past in which respect and honor remained highly valued. The whole of Jeju itself also reduces down to a “folk village,” which extends to the rest of Korea, for the audience may or may not be able to distinguish between Jeju and Seoul, or anywhere else. This temporal and developmental positioning results in the reduction of regional culinary specificity into general national culinary uniformity, which illustrates the role of cuisine in the construction of national identity.

The broad category of Korean cuisine then greatly influences the formation of Korean national identity both domestically and internationally, much of which is due to deliberate government intervention in its aggressive promotion of a national Korean cuisine. This government-sponsored Global Hansik campaign—of which The Kimchi Chronicles is a part—arose in response to “a period of rapid economic growth and an increasing familiarity, even infatuation, with foreign food...it is [such] greater freedom of choice that causes the issues of identity to arise, and it is the consciousness of change that stimulates the inventive use of tradition.”⁷ After the Korean War, South Korea experienced rapid industrialization and economic capital development very quickly and very intensely, and the increasing mass production and globalized movement of goods and cultural influences left many who feared the loss of Korean identity due to new methods of standardization and especially Americanization. The government subsequently launched its Global Hansik Campaign in order to “make [Korean] cuisine ‘national’ through claims of traditional ownership [and] authenticity....Korea lobbied for international standards to be applied to the production of kimchi....[and] in 2009, the government-run Korea Food Research Institute went even further, standardizing Korean food recipes on a national level and claiming the intellectual property rights for them.”⁸ The government identified certain dishes like bibimbap and bulgogi as national dishes of Korea and specific products such as kimchi and makgeolli fermented rice wine as national commodities, with the national claims of the latter two having been fiercely contested with Japan, which for a time was the largest consumer of both kimchi and makgeolli. By explicitly defining such dishes and products as Korean, the government made explicit claims about their status as being authentically Korean, at least in a legally defined sense, and its efforts to standardize their production seeks to establish them as unequivocally Korean, regardless of the region of preparation: “food [is] objectified as a site for the (re-)production of national identity and culture.”⁹ That the Global Hansik Campaign also selected dishes and the style of dining from the Chosŏn dynasty (1392-1897) further illustrates its desire to construct a unified, authentic form of Korean identity through the lens of its national cuisine. In reaching into the past of a unified, independent imperial Korea, the South Korean government effectively ignores the 20th-century history of Japanese colonization, war, and the split into North and South Korea; Korea’s past becomes glorified and romanticized and South Korea becomes the sole purveyor of what is authentically Korean, both in terms of cuisine and national identity. As a result, “South Korean food” is now just “Korean food,” and “South Korean” is really just “Korean.”

⁶ Ali, Media Localism, 44.

⁷ Katarzyna J. Cwiertka, “The Global Hansik Campaign and the Commodification of Korean Cuisine,” The Korean Popular Culture Reader, ed. Kyung Hyun Kim and Youngmin Choe (Durham: Duke University Press, 2014), 366.

This understanding of a Korean national cuisine then shapes the ways in which culinary tourism shows present national cuisines to viewers, or ⁸ Sonia Ryang, Eating Korean in America: Gastronomic Ethnography of Authenticity (Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2015), 1-2.

⁹ Jenny Wang Medina, “Consumption, Class, and Cultural Belonging in South Korean Culinary Dramas, 2003-2012” (PhD diss., Columbia University, 2015), 18.

tourists, as well as the role of the show's host. The Kimchi Chronicles mostly ignores the political and historical realities that have culminated in the present situation of North and South Korea, but it is demonstrative of the ways in which culinary tourism often results in the consumption of the Other, which in this context, is Korea; even though this series was marketed toward American and Korean audiences, its broadcasting on PBS and its English audio clearly target American viewers. By watching the show, Americans may learn about Korean culinary traditions and the proper ways to consume it: "by positioning us [the audience] as tourists, [such] films...present themselves as educational tools, implying that the information we gather from stories, characters, and images can improve our knowledge and understanding of other cultures."¹⁰ In this light, The Kimchi Chronicles and other food tourism films have a seemingly cosmopolitan goal of educating the audience about another culture that is in fact as multifaceted as the audience's own, often creating an affective feeling in viewers that they have achieved a level of cultural and culinary cosmopolitanism. Yet, the visit to a rural farm where the wizened owner grinds soybeans and produces tofu using the old-fashioned, traditional, and therefore more authentic, process of grinding the beans, straining the liquid, hand-sifting out the tofu curds, and reusing the waste for dishwashing is a clear effort to teach the audience about the "real" way Koreans produce tofu, which again, appears against a background set in the temporal past¹¹ that belies this cosmopolitan coeval ideal. The overlooking of the political, historical, economic, and social forces that are at play in the construction of national identity vis-a-vis a national cuisine and the repeated situation of these Korean producers in the developmental, premodern past prevents this cosmopolitan education from being fully realized. Despite this, the show also seeks to promote its authenticity and authority through its host, Marja Vongerichten, whose role as a “‘tour guide’ [is] to introduce characters. The guide is, on the one hand, an insider, allowing viewers to enjoy the illusion of special access; on the other hand, she...serves as a cultural mediator, explaining all that could come across as obscurities to outsiders.”¹² If this is the goal, then the show’s choice of Marja Vongerichten is a distinctive one, for reasons of her own personal history, which introduces contentions in her ability to truly claim Korean cultural authority and authenticity, and which speaks to the larger phenomenon of hybrid identity in the context of Korean adoption.

¹⁰ Laura Lindenfeld and Fabio Parasecoli, Feasting Our Eyes: Food Films and Cultural Identity in the United States (New York: Columbia University Press, 2017), 180.

¹¹ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 5, "The Bean Chronicles," directed by Charles Pinsky, aired July 30, 2011, on PBS, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-_35jtttShQ.

As the host of The Kimchi Chronicles, Marja Vongerichten acts as and becomes the cultural authority for all of Korea and Korean cuisine. As with many other food travel series and television shows, The Kimchi Chronicles invokes the host’s “racial or ethnic heritage...in order to frame his or her take on this kind of food as authentic. This is a cuisine that they grew up with, or experienced among natives, or been taught to cook by immigrant family members, or otherwise understand with a high degree of authority.”¹³ Indeed, half of each episode situates Marja in her home kitchen in the States teaching and guiding her husband through the process of preparing authentic Korean dishes, including her “famous” *kimchi jjigae*¹⁴ and alternatively explaining the purpose of banjan side dishes, how to properly and respectfully serve drinks, and the correct way of thanking someone in Korean, all the while urging her husband, and by extension, the viewers, to “just try some.”¹⁵ That this show chose Marja Vongerichten as its host is notable, as she complicates and challenges this notion of the host’s cultural culinary authority as derived from his or her ¹² Lindenfeld and Parasecoli, 182.

¹³ Lori Kido Lopez, “Asian American Food Blogging as Racial Branding: Rewriting the Search for Authenticity,” Global Asian American Popular Cultures, ed. Shilpa Dave, Leilani Nishime, and Tasha Oren (New York: New York University Press, 2016), 152.

¹⁴ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 3, “The Jeju Chronicles.”

¹⁵ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 1, “The Kimchi Chronicles Begin.”

ethnic background, to which the show even alludes by way of the introduction to each episode. The opening theme introduces Marja and her husband, Jean-Georges by juxtaposing their respective upbringings, ostensibly to construct a cross-cultural narrative between a Korean American woman and a Frenchman. According to the show's biography, Marja "was born in the outskirts of Seoul to an American GI and a young Korean woman....[and] put up for adoption at three, and then lovingly raised in Virginia by her new family...[she later] found her birth mother when she was nineteen."¹⁶ This abrupt forty-second elision of both Marja and Jean-Georges' biographies not only establishes a distinct dichotomy between their two experiences as a male Caucasian French celebrity chef and as a female African Korean Asian American adoptee already creates a power imbalance in terms of culinary and gender authority, but it also seems to violate both of them. The cursory and casual nature of the smooth narration and the rapid flashes of childhood and family photos is a violence to them as human beings, as it effectively compresses them into flattened characters whose lives are mere stories meant for the audience's entertainment. Additionally, the introduction simultaneously glosses over and raises the history and politics surrounding post-war Korea, especially regarding the legacy of American intervention in the region, the South Korean government's adoption programs for war orphans and other children, and its later attempts to extend Korean identity to these children, not to mention the much more personal questions of the hybridity of not only Asian American, but also African American, Afro Asian, and adoptee identity, the latter of which encompasses "adoptees' split temporality and shape-shifting transnationality [that reflect] the complexities and contradictions of the global and also illuminate the ways in which we all negotiate contingencies of personhood out of insufficient and mutable categories of the biological and the social."¹⁷ The ways that adoptee identity challenges such conceptions of identity as resulting from biology is particularly prescient in a Korean and Korean American context.

¹⁶ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 1, "The Kimchi Chronicles Begin."

¹⁷ Eleana J. Kim, Adopted Territory: Transnational Korean Adoptees and the Politics of Belonging (Durham: Duke University Press, 2010), 19.

After the Korean War reached a stalemate in 1953, American and United Nations forces remained in South Korea as an occupying force, and their presence resulted in the eventual births of thousands of mixed-race children that contradicted “the ideology of ‘one people’...that posited Korea as an ethnically homogeneous nation based on unbroken ancestry and shared bloodline. In this context, children of mixed parentage presented a polluting element and also...clear evidence...of South Korea’s dependency on and subordination to postwar American occupying forces.”¹⁸ The advent of the South Korean government’s adoption programs combined with the United States’ neocolonial desire to establish South Korea as an industrialized democratic power resulted in the widespread adoption of these mixed raced babies by American families that also acted to maintain the idea of “one nation, one race (ilguk, ilminju)”¹⁹ in Korea, which, up until this point, had denied these children citizenship and had labeled them as “t’wigi (an extremely offensive term meaning “hybrid” but derogatorily to mean “half-breed” or “half-blood”)...and considered them completely alien.”²⁰ Discomfort with any kind of liminal, hybrid identity led to the denial of Korean and American citizenship and any kind of legal Korean identity, which further illustrates Korea’s strong desire to establish a unified national identity in the wake of its geopolitical separation, as well as a more general aversion to complicated categories of belonging and selfhood. Although the government alienated all mixed race babies, those who were half Korean and half African American suffered the most, both in Korea and America, for “in Korea, half a drop of white or black blood made a child American ¹⁸ Kim, 31-32.

¹⁹ Kim, 62.

²⁰ Arissa H. Oh, To Save the Children of Korea: the Cold War Origins of International Adoption (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2015), 51.

[at a time] when many...still used American and white interchangeably.”²¹ This is extremely problematic both in terms of understanding and conceiving American identity and speaks to the significant role of race in American history and politics, but it remained even more so for those children who were half Korean and half black, which includes Marja Vongerichten herself. In Korea, any mixed race babies faced stigmatization and discrimination based on their Western American heritage, which intensified if those children were half black, since “Korean ideas about color hierarchy had been corroborated by the racial ideologies that accompanied Japanese imperial rule...[and since] Koreans knew that blacks occupied the lowest status in American society.”²² These children presented the greatest threat to Korean notions of a singular ethnonational body politic and identity, as well as confounded the historical conflation of American identity with white identity, both in Korea and the States.

Marja Vongerichten is one of these transgressive, transnational, transracial hybrid subjects, and she is even more fascinating, since she was adopted by African American parents and raised in the United States, where the most prominent marker of her identity was and is her skin color. Whereas in Korea, she is unequivocally American, in the States, she is unequivocally black, and these categorizations both come from understandings of biology and genetics as the sole markers of identity. In interviews, Marja has articulated her own struggles with her identity, especially as a Korean African American with African American parents, saying that this caused “[me to] identify with being African-American because my family was. I wasn’t really accepted as African-American because I don’t really look ‘full’ African-American...black kids would call me oriental.”²³ Her feelings of exclusion and issues of belonging in any singular community further illustrate how deep our collective conceptions of identity rest solely on race and ethnicity that precisely creates so much tension for diasporic communities, but especially adoptee communities, for adoptees exist in a liminal space, born in one place but living in another, often with a family that looks nothing like them. In diasporic communities, cultural memory and practice is at least able to survive through the efforts of older generations that so commonly manifest in culinary reproductions of dishes of the homeland. In adoptee spaces, often the only cultural memory an adoptee has comes from his or her parents' attempts to educate them, which may or may not be "authentic," or from a trip to their birthplace, both of which Marja has experienced; The Kimchi Chronicles frames itself as a "portrait of [an] adoptee....visiting the motherland (moguk pangmun) to explore [her] roots (ppuri ch'atki)."²⁴ In this way, Marja is able to gain knowledge of authentic Korean culinary and cultural practice that will make her a more effective and legitimate purveyor of Korean food in the future, which raises another issue of spatial positioning, for in the States, by virtue of her Korean mother and Korean blood, Marja has authority to teach her husband and the audience about the authentic methods of cooking Korean food, but in Korea, where she has not lived or grown up with Korean parents, she remains an American tourist, evident in her reliance on her Korean translator and guide.

²¹ Oh, 68.

²² Oh, 131.

²³ David Lee Sanders. “Interview with Marja Vongerichten,” last modified August 31, 2011, http://www.halfkorean.com/?page_id=6502.

Moreover, she remarks that "my life has been quite a ride, born in Korea, raised in America, and now back in my mogu motherland...it's amazing for me to come back with my husband...but what really blows me away is seeing my [daughter] here in Korea. In some strange way, it makes up for the childhood I missed out on in Korea. I know I'm blessed,"²⁵ which emphasizes the show's framing of her returning to her birthplace to "discover" or arguably "rediscover" her roots; the former connotes an idea of enlightenment upon newfound knowledge, while the latter suggests turning back to the past or to something forgotten. For Marja, both are true: she simultaneously discovers new facets and nuances of contemporary Korea that is so distant from the post-war context of her birth, which she subsequently rediscovers as unrecognizable from the place in her memory or her constructed memory. For Marja's daughter, traveling to Korea is simply "going" to Korea. She herself has no geographic connections there; both she and her mother were raised surrounded by and immersed in American culture. Any discovery she experiences is not necessarily as a Korean citizen or young Korean girl; though her own perceptions of herself as Korean do shape her identity, Korea is not where she finds belonging, just as Marja herself does not. Furthermore, Marja's expressed nostalgia for the idea of a lost Korean childhood, which may be coded as a more genuine Korean upbringing, implies a "quest...in issues of procreation [with] the role accorded to 'blood' and 'actual' facts...[that are] considered foundational to personal identity, and that includes knowledge about both birth and parentage."²⁶ Marja seems to long for a Korean childhood in which she would not have the inherent tensions and complex emotions that are inherent to being an adoptee, and in seeing her daughter there, Marja seems to project her own life onto her daughter's and vice versa, living vicariously through her. Yet, Marja aches for a life that arguably could never be, at least in the specific historical context of post-war Korea, in which her unmarried mother with a mixed race child was considered a prostitute, and in which her half black heritage would bring much personal struggle and social ostracization. Marja's nostalgia and romance of Korea manifests in her daughter's trip and in her own return to her birthplace, in reality, present more challenges to her sense of self.

²⁴ Kim, Adopted Territory, 177.

²⁵ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 4, "The Seafood Chronicles," directed by Charles Pinsky, aired July 23, 2011, on PBS, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=As5i_2KF8Jg.

²⁶ See Marilyn Strathern in Kim, Adopted Territory, 89.

Although Marja refers to Korea as her “mogu, motherland,”²⁷ upon her return to the “purported homeland, [she] confront[s] the impossibility of true repatriation in the form of seamless belonging or full legal incorporation and may discover that [her] hybridity, which is marked by racial difference in [her] adoptive country is, in the context of Korea, inverted, thus swinging [her] to the other side of...[the] pendulum from Korean to...American.”²⁸ Interestingly, unlike many adoptee return trips or self-discovery journeys, Marja managed to reconnect with her birth mother and biological relatives, though not in Korea; according to an interview, Marja found her birth mother in Brooklyn, which further complicates the notion of the “return.”²⁹ Though she and other adoptees may believe that reconnecting with their birth mothers will somehow stabilize their sense of self and belonging, it in fact does the opposite, for they are as good as strangers despite their blood-relatedness; the strangeness and non-existence of this relationship again illustrates the limits of blood kinship. Additionally, that Marja finds her birth mother in the United States reflects the diasporic movement of Koreans to the States and across the world. Indeed, in the act of referring to her place of birth as the “homeland” or “motherland,” Marja, like many other adoptees, and like many other hyphenated Americans, gives the ultimate precedence to the idea of origins and cedes power to a place that she has no memory of and that barred her belonging; rather than asserting her own self, she allows Korea to decide who she is. Yet, the “return” is fraught in different ways for these two distinct groups: Asian Americans who are American-born second generation children of immigrants, have no experience, memory of, or origin point in the home country save that of their parents’ incidental traditional practices at home; and adoptees, who do have this origin point and link to the home country, yet are often raised by Caucasian parents and do not find acceptance upon their return journeys.

²⁷ The Kimchi Chronicles, episode 4, “The Seafood Chronicles.”

²⁸ Kim, Adopted Territory, 186-187.

²⁹ Sanders, “Interview with Marja Vongerichten.”

The idea that returning to one's homeland will automatically grant a sense of belonging and claims of legitimate identity does not exist, and the adoptee is left to grapple with her liminality once more.

Despite the challenges that liminal identity presents to the construction of a singular ethnonational identity as well as to the hybrids themselves—the adoptees, the Asian Americans, and those of mixed race—the Korean government has made concerted efforts to incorporate these hybrids into a united Korean national body. Although the Korean government originally prevented mixed race GI babies from obtaining citizenship on the grounds of their biracial blood, it has recently made strides to “toward the construction of [a] ‘deterritorialized nation-state’ through the political incorporation of diasporic populations,”³⁰ most notably in the form of the Overseas Korean Act, which extends Korean citizenship to select overseas Korean populations. The act includes Korean Americans and Korean Japanese as citizens, while excluding Korean Chinese and Korean Russians for political and historical reasons, while also postulating that Korean citizenship rests on one's paternal lineage: having a Korean father or grandfather is another requirement.³¹ Despite this supposed need to have blood of a Korean father, “the Korean state has extended recognition to adoptees as ‘overseas Koreans,’ thereby enfolding them into an official version of the Korean diaspora.”³² The inherent contradiction in the law's requirements reveals the problems of trying to construct a unified national identity, especially when considering diasporic communities abroad, many of whose members were not born in Korea. Under this law, adoptees like Marja Vongerichten would simultaneously qualify and disqualify for Korean citizenship based on their birth in Korea and their being Korean American, but also because their fathers were precisely not Korean. Furthermore, if the law's use of "legal categories to define 'Korean identity' ...entails the construction of a Korean identity based on 'primordial' ethnic ties and the belief in shared blood and heritage (hyŏlt'ongjuŭi),"³³ then why would this return to the legendary roots of all Koreans then exclude ethnic Koreans living in Russia and China? The Overseas Korean Act seeks to construct a technical definition of Korean identity with stipulations for belonging in reaction to globalization and ever-increasing minority groups, but in effect, it overlooks the realities of diasporic community and identity construction; though it claims to prize ethnic Koreanness above all else, the government rejects ethnic but non-national Koreans like Marja, who may arguably never be truly considered Korean by virtue of her black heritage.

³⁰ Paul Y Chang and Jung-Sun Park, “Contention in the Construction of Global Korean Community: the Case of the Overseas Korean Act,” The Journal of Korean Studies 10.1 (2005): 1.

³¹ Chang and Park, 3.

³² Kim, Adopted Territory, 98.

Yet, it is precisely people like Marja who challenge the strong associations many have between the body and ethnicity and identity. Though she does not look Korean upon first glance, Marja's personal history and experiences of Korean culture and her own Koreanness have hugely affected her sense of self, and her life as a transplanted, hybrid adoptee subject has contributed much more to the construction of her identity than the physical markers of her Koreanness have, which are tied to a "strong ethnic identity has already been gestured to in stories about connecting to a country or culture of origin and emphasizing the importance of family and a family history in telling food stories. But another important element of tracing the...identities of Asian American[s]...is the literal movement of peoples between the United States and Asia and the transnational...identities that such flows create."³⁴ The narrative of The Kimchi Chronicles, and to a further extent, the efforts of the Korean government, attempt to do exactly this: emphasize Marja's Korean ethnic identity to connect her to Korea in order to grant her the power to disseminate cultural capital of Korean food, but such a narrative denies Marja herself in having a say in who she is. It is the fact of both her Korean birth and American adoption that drives her to learn Korean, to travel to Seoul, to learn about her history, and to seek out and cook Korean food as opposed to her Korean origins. She represents the flow of adoptee diaspora and the hybridity and code-switching that result from being an adoptee; one who “demonstrate[s] how identity...[is] forged at blurred intersections”³⁵ in ways that characterize the cosmopolitan subject and all of its contradictions. Although Marja may never feel fully Korean, American, Asian American, or African American, she remains all three at once and can navigate sub-communities in both the United States and Korea; there may come no day of unconditional acceptance into any of those communities, yet she can still enter their borderlands that is demonstrative of a liminal, cosmopolitan subject.

³³ Chang and Park, "Contention in the Construction of Korean Identity," 3.

³⁴ Lopez, "Asian American Food Blogging," 157-158.

The effects of globalization have had many implications for the flow of goods, capital, and culture, including culinary pathways and production, which in turn may act as representations and markers of ethnic, racial, and national identity. Food travel shows and other forms of culinary tourism embody these phenomena: educating others about other cultures and places and making those places accessible; solidifying notions and boundaries of a national cuisine as representative of a nation and its citizens; the subtle framing of these culinary practices as Other in a reflection of how the “media deployment of culinary consumption and preparation...has always functioned as a marker of identity, class, and mastery...[and] aimed to educate its viewers in proper consumption and coherent national, class, and gendered identities.”³⁶ Although these shows often do turn a neo-imperialist gaze on Otherness through temporal and spatial positioning, they also have the power to raise questions of identity and challenge existing ideas about identity construction. One such show is The Kimchi Chronicles, which is not an especially innovative or original travel show, yet, through its host Marja Vongerichten, a female Korean African American adoptee, the show becomes a lens through which to study identity, hybridity, and liminality in the wake of globalization, diaspora, and national reactions to the free movement of people and ideas, specifically in a Korean, American, Asian American, and adoptee context. Marja demonstrates the limits of biological and birthplace in determining identity, and the problems of those who try to make them so both through her own personal history and her body. The Kimchi Chronicles gives her cultural authority over Korean cuisine and culinary production that in reality is tenuous as a result of the strong ethnic associations we conflate with identity, for her life in the United States and her American family in many ways have defined her more than her Koreanness, though that plays no small role either. Ultimately, The Kimchi Chronicles shows the complexities and intersectionality inherent in a hybrid, cosmopolitan adoptee subject that fundamentally redefines how we conceive of identity construction.

³⁵ Kim, Adopted Territory, 86.

³⁶ Tasha Oren, “The Blood Sport of Cooking: On Asian American Chefs and Television,” Global Asian American Popular Cultures, ed. Shilpa Dave, Leilani Nishie, and Tasha Oren (New York: New York University Press, 2016), 248-249.

References

- Ali, Christopher. "Mapping the Local." In Media Localism: The Policies of Place, 30-50. Urbana, Chicago, Springfield: University of Illinois Press, 2017.
<http://www.jstor.org/stable/10.5406/j.ctt1m3219c.6>.
- Chang, Paul Y. and Park, Jung-Sun. "Contention in the Construction of a Global Korean Community: the Case of the Overseas Korean Act." The Journal of Korean Studies 10, no. 1 (2005): 1-27.
<http://www.jstor.org/stable/41490207>.
- Cwiertka, Katarzyna J. "The Global Hansik Campaign and the Commodification of Korean Cuisine." In The Korean Popular Culture Reader, edited by Youngmin Choi and Kyung Hyun Kim, 363-384. Durham: Duke University Press, 2014.
- Kim, Eleana J. Adopted Territory: Transnational Korean Adoptees and the Politics of Belonging. Durham: Duke University Press, 2010.
- Lindenfeld, Laura, and Fabio Parasecoli. "Consuming the Other: Food Films as Culinary Tourism." In Feasting Our Eyes: Food Films and Cultural Identity in the United States, 175-204. New York: Columbia University Press, 2017.
<http://www.jstor.org/stable/10.7312/lind17250.11>.
- Lopez, Lori Kido. "Asian American Food Blogging as Racial Branding: Rewriting the Search for Authenticity." In Global Asian American Popular Cultures, edited by Shilpa Davé, Leilani Nishime, and Tasha Oren, 151-64. New York: NYU Press, 2016.
<http://www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctt18040jc.14>.

- Medina, Jenny Wang. "Consumption, Class, and Cultural Belonging in South Korean Culinary Dramas, 2003-2012." PhD diss., Columbia University, 2015.
- Oh, Arissa H. To Save the Children of Korea: The Cold War Origins of International Adoption. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2015.
- Oren, Tasha. "The Blood Sport of Cooking: On Asian American Chefs and Television." In Global Asian American Popular Cultures, edited by Shilpa Davé, Leilani Nishime, and Tasha Oren, 244-60. New York: NYU Press, 2016.
<http://www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctt18040jc.20>.
- Pinsky, Charles, dir. The Kimchi Chronicles. (Republic of Korea and the United States: American Public Television, 2011), television.
- Ryang, Sonia. Eating Korean in America: Gastronomic Ethnography of Authenticity, 1-20. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press, 2015.
<http://www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctt13x1j18.4>.
- Sanders, David Lee. "Interview with Marja Vongerichten." HalfKorean. Last modified August 31, 2011.
http://www.halfkorean.com/?page_id=6502.